After the housing bubble comes the settlement bubble

The consequences of the housing bubble is what we all feel in recent years. But the era of the bubbles just started. Now "50" state attorneys general are negotiating with the creators of the housing bubble. The banks are hard to negotiate with, they have the best lobbyists, they have the power of the money on their side. Oh, and I almost forgot: isn't it strange to see as part of the Obama administration that tries to push the settlement through, the exact same key people, who cleared the way in front of the banks during the housing bubble? So

While the rich found their way out from recession, the middle-class is hit hard by the approach of another recession, which is signaled by multiple research companies and forecast firms. So the middle class raised its voice and began to shout out loud to Washington and to everybody who was and who wasn't listening: something is wrong here. It started about a week ago in Lower Manhattan and it spread rapidly like fire across the US: the protest against Wall Street. At this time protest is the message: income inequality is grinding down the middle class, increasing ranks of the Audit result: 84 percent of recent foreclosures violate the law

California was one of the mostly hurt states by the foreclosure crisis, as multiple reports highlight, but the main question is: does the foreclosure process comply with the law? A recent audit determined that of about 400 recent foreclosures, almost all violate the law and contain suspicious papers in the submitted documentation. Well, this doesn't look good at all. There were plentiful of reports of foreclosure abuse, but this audit underscores a serious problem in California, as it rolled out with numbers, and pointed to where the foreclosure process fails to comply with the law. And the list of foreclosure ...
