When envy grows

Left unchecked, this deadly sin can sabotage your team's performance — and your own. But research uncovers ways for you to counter it

BY TERRY MCKENNA AND LISA THOMPSON • ILLUSTRATION BY CONNACH BRECON

A 1992 study revealed organizational envy in the office, one study after another, and it has been a major challenge for the Harvard School of Business since then. The results have been consistent: Envy is a common emotion in the workplace, and it can be a major obstacle to success. In one study, researchers found that employees who reported high levels of envy were more likely to be absent from work and less committed to their organization. In another study, researchers found that employees who reported high levels of envy were more likely to be absent from work and less committed to their organization.

A TALE OF TWO COLLEAGUES

There's a story about two colleagues who were working together on a project. One was a man and the other was a woman. They were both very talented and hardworking. They were both very talented and hardworking. They were both very talented and hardworking. They were both very talented and hardworking.

THE DAMAGING SIDE EFFECTS
