HOW DOES GAMBLING AFFECT THE BRAIN

As science developed, more and more scientists began to wonder how exactly does gambling activity affect the human brain? Is it useful or bad for us?

The answer is predictable: too much isn't good, either. Gambling activities in moderate doses is useful and refreshing for your brain, but the benefit is reciprocally proportional to the time spent on gambling.

PROS

- Both wins and losses in games of chance give us the necessary amount of stress to keep us alert and ready to act without severe pressure in real life.
- Gambling activities stimulate the secretion of dopamine, and this brings you into a condition close to an alcoholic or narcotic intoxication - but without using such nasty stuff.
- Poker, as well as some other skill-based card games, positively influences and stimulates the sections of the brain which are affected by Alzheimer's Disease.
- Skill games can help you train sequential thought and calculate chances, which is very valuable in many real-life situations.

CONS

- Unchecked gambling activity leads to various dysfunctions in a human brain, and it begins to generate dopamine only during gambling, making other kinds of hobbies less interesting. As a result, a person could become addicted to gambling.
- The addiction progresses faster when one wins than when one loses.
- The more time, efforts and funds are involved in gambling activities - the stronger the influence. Your brain is not a computing machine, but the most crucial part of the organism, and it tries to maximize the pleasure that you get from gambling, and minimize the discomfort from it.

RED FLAG

The gambler's fallacy is the most typical mistake: gamblers erroneously think that random losses in the past are somehow changing the probability of a random win in the future. You can imagine how this works if it is called the "gambler's fallacy." In a nutshell, the probability of each particular random event is the same, no matter how many events happened before. The probability of the whole sequence of events might trend to zero, but each of them is distinctly possible.

CONCLUSIONS

You shouldn't forget that your brain plays an active role. It can get affected by the gambling experience, but if it's bright and sober, it changes the results of such an experience.

- Don't start gambling if you haven't slept well, or if you're drunk, sick or tired.
- You also shouldn't play after a heavy meal, because the blood flows to the stomach, and leaves the brain with not enough oxygen for the active thought.
